hundreds of forks, spoons, demitasse spoons, and silver knives for him to do. From all these objects a shimmering white light reflected, so that his body from the waist up was covered with silver scales. He had cut away from his shoes the part that covered his toes, and his trousers were held up with a red sash, and no matter where he stood, he was always a good portrait. The bare walls of the silver room were tiled, and against the precise divisions of the tiles one could measure him and even his movements —three tiles across for the shoulder, eight from the elbow to the wrist, and ten from the top of his head to the first ribs on his chest.

He was most happy in the workshop of the old tailor who made the uniforms for the hotel staff and pressed and repaired them. Kalakobé brought food to the tailor's cat and held it in his arms while he sat in a corner of the room, watching the doormen with envy as they were being measured for new coats. His dream was to be a doorman someday and wear a beautiful uniform. Occasionally he would get up and stand in front of the rows of closets in which gala liveries for footmen and elevator boys hung, or go through the drawers filled an obscure African arrangement of two nude ladies beaten into it. Then he slipped on a form-fitting mauve overcoat that reached almost to the floor. He left the coat open, and wore one yellow glove and carried the other in the gloved hand. As he came out of the hotel he lit up the entire street.

KALAKOBÉ was supposed to work only during the daytime, but when we had banquets in the ballroom, he was paid a little extra to come up and get the casseroles used in the banquet kitchen and, with a long iron hook, drag them into an elevator and down to his pantry. At first he came only during the serving of the meal and left with the cooks, but then he found out that if he waited until the party was over and the tables were being cleared, the waiters would come back from the ballroom with a trayful of glasses in each hand, and in each of the glasses some drink would be left. After that he always stayed in the pantry and waited for the empty glasses. He poured all the drinks—champagne, Moselle, Burgundy, Bénédictine, rye, Scotch, Irish whiskey, brandy, and kümmel—into one pitcher, added lemon and sugar and ice, and bottled

ARTS AND CRAFTS REPORT. -- Miss Sanders

Jane Ann has done much vigorous and original shop work. She enjoys the handling of colors, which she does very well. She has a good sense of form and proportion. She improves rapidly in new work, and is not easily discouraged. She is cooperative with the group.

ADDITIONAL COMMENTS: Jane Ann is making good academic progress. She definitely should learn to adjust herself to group situations and to adult contacts without constantly attempting to call attention to herself.

Sally's handwork is average for her age. She hasn't the interest in painting, drawing or building that she has in reading, literature and music. At times, it requires considerable urging to have her use art materials.

ADDITIONAL COMMENTS:

Sally is growing to be less self conscious than she was early in the year.

Emma Flinn
Signature of teacher.

When choosing time is given at school, Sally is very slow to decide upon her work. Almost always, she finally chooses to read. It is suggested that she be encouraged to build, paint, draw and model during the summer.

TO CORPORATION LAWYERS

We are equipped to handle for attorneys the details incidental to the Incorporation, Qualification, and Maintenance of Corporations. WE ARE PREPARED TO:

Ascertain the availability of names for corporate use.

Submit comparative information to aid in selecting the state of incorporation best suited to circumstances.

Draft the charter and by-laws for the attorney's approval. Furnish incorporators, file the certificate of incorporation, hold the organization meeting, elect permanent directors, and transfer the original subscriptions to the permanent stockholders.

Transmit to the attorney a complete, organized company, with minute book containing complete organization records, consisting of copy of charter, original by-laws and minutes of incorporators' meeting.

Maintain the principal office and keep the corporate records as required by law. Where required by statute, furnish a resident agent.

Give the corporation ample notice to prepare for the annual meeting.

Qualify and maintain business corporations in states outside the state of incorporation.

Give ample notice of due dates for state reports and state tax requirements, furnishing report forms in duplicate upon which to make returns.

Advise attorneys of changes in the state laws that may materially affect the proper maintenance of the corporation.

Prentice-Hall attends to the numerous details incidental to the incorporation, qualification and maintenance of corporations, thus permitting the attorney to devote his attention to questions of constructive policy. This incorporating service is rendered to attorneys only.
